This spiky antidote to superhero oversaturation ends up impaling only itself.

The actor breaks the fourth wall as the scarred superhero

Deadpool is the Marvel character for people who think they're too smart for comic books but read them anyway. He's sarcastic but also prone to self-mockery, and he takes pride in breaking the fourth wall. He seems to know it's ridiculous to be circumscribed by a comic-book panel, so why not bust out of it now and then?

If you're going to make a Deadpool movie—as first-time director Tim Miller has—Ryan Reynolds is the guy to play him. Reynolds delivers every line with a smirk you can hear—a good thing because Deadpool's face is completely obscured by a stretchy red mask, the better to hide his scarred, mottled visage. There's a story behind that face—because isn't there always? In flashback we learn that Deadpool used to be smart-alecky mercenary Wade Wilson, who is diagnosed with incurable cancer just after becoming engaged to the love of his life, Vanessa (Morena Baccarin). Enter evil face-mangler Ajax (Ed Skrein)—also known by his far less sexy real name, Francis—who mangles Wade's face after promising to turn him into a cancer-free mutant with superpowers. Wade becomes the hypercynical Deadpool, running amok as he chases Francis to get revenge for his eternal bad-face day. In between skewering thugs with his trademark twin swords and letting the wisecracks fly ("I'm about to do to you what Limp Bizkit did to music in the late nineties"), our masked misanthrope reflects, with unseen but surely misty eyes, on how much he misses his lost love. The sentimental hokum is the best thing about the picture: The violence may be abundant, but it's not particularly gratifying, and the repetitive plot mechanics don't help. Deadpool, intended as a spiky antidote to superhero oversaturation, ends up impaling only itself.

Start writing paper here with a hook. The last sentence of this intro paragraph will be the thesis statement. The thesis statement will contain the claim and reasons for the claim. The structure will look something along these lines. Blank movie was the best movie in the blank series because of the first reason, the second reason, and the third reason.

The second paragraph will be reason number one. This paragraph will contain specific examples from the reviews that pertain to reason number one. Make sure the citations are formatted correctly (Source, 2017). There should be two or three reasons that go with reason number one. Make sure to include a transition word between each paragraph. |

Enter evil face-mangler Ajax (Ed Skrein)--also known by his far less sexy real name, Francis--who mangles Wade's face after promising to turn him into a cancer-free mutant with superpowers. Wade becomes the hypercynical Deadpool, running amok as he chases Francis to get revenge for his eternal bad-face day. In between skewering thugs with his trademark twin swords and letting the wisecracks fly ("I'm about to do to you what Limp Bizkit did to music in the late nineties"), our masked misanthrope reflects, with unseen but surely misty eyes, on how much he misses his lost love. The sentimental hokum is the best thing about the picture: The violence may be abundant, but it's not particularly gratifying, and the repetitive plot mechanics don't help. Deadpool, intended as a spiky antidote to superhero oversaturation, ends up impaling only itself.

CAN A POPCORN MOVIE ALSO BE POLITICAL? THIS ONE CAN WHETHER YOU'RE MINDLESS OR MENSA, YOU'LL FIND STUFF HERE TO CHALLENGE AND TROUBLE YOU

The first thing a film critic (this one, anyway) should say of V for Vendetta is that it's a terrific movie. I love the look and the verve of the thing, the confidence of its epic design, its smart use of half a dozen noted British thespians, lending weight and wit to the supporting roles. Hugo Weaving gives the finest no-face performance since Eric Stoltz in Mask, and Natalie Portman, always an eye magnet, does her sharpest film work yet. In her sobbing scenes, when her will must be broken, then forged anew, she comes darn close to acting.

Which is to say, Vendetta is up there with the Wachowski brothers' first Matrix film, which anybody could see had more on its agenda than aerobic martial arts. The brothers, who wrote the Vendetta script that James McTeigue spiffily directed, are back in top form—not larding political meaning on an action plot but finding a seamless blending of the two. Whether you're mindless or Mensa, you'll find stuff here to Start writing paper here with a hook. The last sentence of this intro paragraph will be the thesis statement. The thesis statement will contain the claim and reasons for the claim. The structure will look something along these lines. Blank movie was the best movie in the blank series because of the first reason, the second reason, and the third reason.

The second paragraph will be reason number one. This paragraph will contain specific examples from the reviews that pertain to reason number one. Make sure the citations are formatted correctly (Source, 2017). There should be two or three reasons that go with reason number one. Make sure to include a transition word between each paragraph.
